

@ShopAdonisCares

Stronger Than I Ever Planned to Be.

The strength reset for the single mom who does it all — and deserves to feel it.

You're the mom and the dad. The paycheck and the bedtime story.

There's no one to tap out to. No "your turn" at 3am, no second income, no one to split the mental load. You wake up, you carry all of it, and you do it again tomorrow — tired, often alone, and somehow still showing up.

This isn't a pity party. It's recognition — and a few real systems so the weight doesn't break you. You're not doing it wrong. It actually is this hard. And you're still doing it.

THE TRUTH

You're not "less than" a two-parent home. You're doing the work of two and somehow keeping a whole little person alive and loved. That's not failure — that's heroic.

Stop comparing your solo race to their relay

You measure yourself against two-parent families and come up "behind." But you're running the same race with half the runners. Drop that ruler.

- A messier house with one parent is not a character flaw.
- "Behind" on a two-income budget with one income is just math, not failure.
- Tired isn't weak. You're doing a two-person job.
- Your kid needs a present, sane parent — not a perfect, depleted one.

Judge your day by "did we get through it with love?" — not by a standard built for two adults.

Bare-minimum mode is allowed

On the hard weeks, survival is the goal — not Pinterest. Pre-decide your "good enough" so guilt doesn't get a vote:

- Dinner: cereal, frozen, or toast nights are fine. Fed is the standard.
- Screens: extra screen time on a brutal day is not damage. It's a tool.
- House: clean enough to be safe beats spotless. Lower the bar on purpose.
- Activities: you can say no. Two things, not ten.

My "good enough" on a hard week looks like:

STEP 3

Build your village (you weren't meant to solo it)

"Independent" doesn't mean "alone." The strongest single moms are the ones who build a net. Start one:

- Find your people. Other single moms get it — a group, an app, the school pickup line.
- Swap, don't suffer. Trade babysitting / carpools with another parent. Two villages, half the load.
- Accept the offer. When someone says "let me know," hand them a real task.
- Use your community. Family, church, neighbors, programs. Asking is strength, not weakness.

One person I'll reach out to this week:

Lighten the load (money & logistics)

You can't add hours, but you can remove friction. A few moves that buy back time and breathing room:

- One tiny buffer. Even $5–10 a week into a separate "oh no" fund. A small cushion changes everything.
- Check what you qualify for. Many single parents leave real support on the table — look into local programs, tax credits, childcare assistance.
- Automate & simplify. Auto-pay bills, a shared family calendar, a launch-pad by the door.
- Batch it. One cooking session, one errand run, one admin hour — not scattered all week.

This is general organization, not financial advice. A quick search for "single parent assistance + your area" is worth 10 minutes.

Refill the engine (that's you)

You're the whole power source for your family. Maintenance isn't selfish — it's required. Tiny, guilt-free refills:

- 15 minutes that are yours after bedtime — not chores, actual rest.
- One thing a week that reminds you you're a woman, not just a mom.
- Protect your sleep like it's your job. (It kind of is.)
- Talk to someone — a friend, a therapist, a helpline. You carry a lot.

My 15-minute refill tonight:

Look at everything you carry — and still you rise.

You never planned for this much weight. And you're carrying it anyway — with love, with grit, with a kid who thinks you hung the moon. Lower the bar, build your village, refill the engine. You are stronger than you ever planned to be.

@ShopAdonisCares