

@ShopAdonisCares

Co-Parenting With Someone Impossible.

Protect your peace and your kids when your ex makes everything a war.

START HERE

You can't make them reasonable. You can protect your peace.

Every handoff is a landmine. Every text is bait. They twist, stall, guilt-trip, and pull the kids into the middle — and you're left shaking with anger and dread before you've even had coffee.

You will not "win them over" or get the apology. But you can stop handing them your peace. This is a calm, practical playbook for co-parenting with a high-conflict ex — and keeping your kids (and yourself) steady through it.

THE MINDSET SHIFT

Stop managing their behavior. Start managing your exposure to it. That's the whole game — and it's the part you actually control.

STEP 1

Drop the rope

A high-conflict ex needs a reaction to feel powerful. Every time you defend, explain, or argue, you're holding the other end of the rope. Let it go.

- Stop expecting fairness. Expecting them to be reasonable is what keeps hurting you.
- Don't take the bait. The dig, the jab, the "we need to talk" — you can let it sit.
- Not every message needs a reply. And none needs an instant one.
- Disengage from the past. You will never re-litigate the marriage into a win.

When there's no one pulling back, the rope goes slack. Your calm is not weakness — it's the most powerful move you have.

STEP 2

Communicate like it's on a billboard

Use the BIFF method for every message. Imagine a judge reading it. Brief beats brilliant.

B

Brief. 2-4 sentences.
No essays.

I

Informative. Facts and logistics only.

F

Friendly. Neutral, polite tone.

F

Firm. Clear, no
opening to argue.

“ Thanks for letting me know. Pickup is at 5pm Friday as scheduled. See you then.

“ I'm only able to discuss the children's schedule and needs. I won't be responding to the rest.

STEP 3

Document everything

With a high-conflict ex, your memory isn't enough — your records are. Quietly, consistently:

- Keep it in writing. Move conversations to text/email or a co-parenting app. No verbal-only deals.
- Log incidents. Date, time, what happened, who was there. Facts, no emotion.
- Save everything. Screenshots, messages, missed exchanges, late pickups.
- Confirm in writing. "Just confirming we agreed to..." after any phone call.

WHY IT MATTERS

A calm paper trail protects you and your kids if things ever escalate — and it keeps you out of he-said/she-said. Write for the record, not the fight.

Shield the kids

The research is clear: it's not the divorce that harms kids — it's being caught in the conflict. Be the calm shore.

- Never bad-mouth their other parent — even when it's deserved, even when they start it.
- Don't use kids as messengers or quiz them about the other house.
- Be the stable, predictable home. Routine and calm are medicine.
- Let them love both parents without guilt. That's a gift only you can give.

If they vent about the other house, say:

"That sounds hard. I'm always here to listen. You're allowed to love both of us."

STEP 5

Your peace plan

Protect your own nervous system on purpose — especially around exchanges:

- Set message hours. You don't check or reply to non-emergencies after, say, 8pm.
- Buffer the handoff. Plan a calm-down ritual right after — a walk, a call to a friend, music.
- Mute, don't monitor. Turn off notifications; check on your schedule, not theirs.
- Build your corner. One friend, a therapist, or a support group who gets it.

My post-handoff reset will be:

You're doing enough.

Read them before the next exchange:

- I can only control my home, my words, and my reactions.
- Their chaos is not my emergency.
- Staying calm is winning — even when they want a fight.
- My kids need one steady parent. I can be that.
- I don't need them to be reasonable to build a peaceful life.

If your ex is ever threatening or you feel unsafe, document it and contact a lawyer or local authorities. Protecting yourself is protecting your kids.

Drop the rope.
Keep your peace.
Be their calm.

You can't fix them — and you were never supposed to. Brief, firm, documented, calm. Protect your kids, protect your peace, and let their chaos stay theirs.

@ShopAdonisCares