

@ShopAdonisCares

The Invisible Load

Everyone's taken care of. Except me.

A 5-minute reset for the woman who carries the whole house in her head.

START HERE

You're not crazy. You're carrying the mental load.

It's the invisible to-do list that runs in the background of your mind every waking minute. The appointments. Who needs what. What's running low. The thing you can't forget.

Nobody sees it. Everybody depends on it. And it never, ever turns off — which is why you can be "doing nothing" and still feel exhausted.

THIS ISN'T A PLANNER

It's permission to put some of it down — and a simple, 5-minute way to actually do it. You don't need to carry all of this. You never did.

STEP 1

Get the invisible list out of your head

You can't put down what you can't see. Empty it here — every little thing you're the only one tracking.

Can't think of it all? Answer these: What am I the only one keeping track of? · What's running low? · Who needs something this week? · What deadline or form is in my head? · What keeps me up at night?

STEP 2

The 3-pile sort

Now put every item from your list into one of three piles. Be honest — and be generous with the last two.

Mine

Truly only I can do this. Keep this pile small.

Share

Someone else can own this. Not help — own.

Drop

The world will not end. Let it go.

Most of what you carry is not actually yours to carry alone. Look at your "Mine" pile — how much of it is just there because you're the only one who ever picked it up?

STEP 3

The hand-off scripts

The hardest part of sharing the load is the words. Here they are — copy them exactly. Notice each one says own, not "help."

“ Can you own [X] from now on? Not help with it — own it.

“ I need you to take [X] off my plate completely.

“ From now on, [X] is yours. I'm not tracking it anymore.

“ I'm not doing [X] this week. It can wait.

WHY "OWN," NOT "HELP"

"Can you help me with the laundry?" leaves the laundry on your list forever. "The laundry is yours now" takes it off. Ownership moves the weight. Help just shares the lifting.

Put down one thing a day

You don't have to fix it all today. Offload one thing a day — share it or drop it. In a week, that's seven things off your mind. In a month, thirty.

Day	The one thing I put down	Shared / Dropped
Mon
Tue
Wed
Thu
Fri
Sat
Sun

Put it down.

Read these out loud. Then believe them — they're true.

- I am not the only capable adult in this house.
- Sharing the load is not failing. It's leadership.
- A dropped ball is not a disaster.
- I don't have to earn rest.
- "Taken care of" includes me.

One thing I'm putting down today:

You were never supposed to carry all of it.

Put down one thing today. Then breathe. The people who love you would rather have a rested you than a perfectly-managed everything.

@ShopAdonisCares